This interactive bulletin board is a great tool for gathering and discussing student presentations.

In this video, Terri Nelson shows you how to capitalize on the features of Dotstorming—an interactive bulletin board that she uses for student speeches (presentations) and essays. Students comment on each others' work then vote on the Most Provocative before debating the topic in the Thursday synchronous class.

Quick Tips:

Make your Zoom Classroom available for students “after” hours
Create a unique Zoom Meeting Room for each class. Choose Recurring Meeting and set the Recurrence to No Fixed Time. Put a password on the meeting to keep out zoom-bombers. Now your students can use the Zoom Room for group work—even without you there!

Create Google Docs for Zoom Breakout Room Tasks
When you use breakout rooms in Zoom, it’s helpful to keep groups on task by giving them a document to complete. Create a Google doc named 1- Group Work [additional info] (having the number first makes it easier when multiple tabs are open). In the document, place a prompt for each task you want students to complete—such as: Answer these questions, Summarize your key discussion findings, etc. If useful, put an image of the presentation slide you want them to discuss. Next, change the Share settings so that the document can be edited (the default is View) by anyone with the link (check the External Access box). Then duplicate and rename this document so that there are enough copies for each group (i.e. 5 groups = 5 copies). Finally, create a “master document” where you link to each of the Group documents you just created. Share this document (View with URL). In class, before you use breakout rooms, post the URL for the Master Document in Chat. Ask each group to complete the form. You can watch & comment on their progress easily without the delay of switching breakout rooms.
